In addition to her work in private practice, Hinkle has had a wealth of experiences through her lifetime as an educator, academic, community activist, writer and advocate for the rights of women, children and the underprivileged. Her legal experiences include clerking at the Division of Law – DYFS, participating in the Child and Family Advocacy Clinic at Rutgers University School of Law – Camden, representing children in getting SSI determinations, representing and advocating for victims of domestic violence, and mediating in municipal and superior court. Her commitment to justice and fairness has led her to develop a holistic philosophy of lawyering, where she attempts to consider the long term and general life goals of the client, and when applicable the clients' children, in solving their immediate legal problems. Hinkle has a J.D. from Rutgers Law in Camden, a Masters in Teaching from Rowan University, and a Masters in English from Rutgers University. She has worked in politics, run a boutique writing and public relations company, and taught at the high school and community college level. In addition to her education and experience, Hinkle is Editor in Chief and Founder of an international, peer reviewed feminist academic journal, MP Journal (www.academinist.org) and is active in the community.
